Perhaps he was ruminating somewhat to this effect when the clumpclumping of the boots followed by a vigorous bombardment at his door, interrupted him. He rises and opens the door, starting, half with fear, half with pleasure at the stalwart figure before him. "Good mornin', sir, says the miner, still speaking with the accent he had picked up in the California mines. "Good morning; come in," the other replies, holding the door hospitably open. "Can I look at the pictures?" "Certainly."

The visitor steps over the threshold, and by the time the artist has closed the door and seated himself at his work, he has gone round the room, has looked at them, and plainly failed to find something he had hoped to see. He stands now and watches the artist laying the colors on the canvas.

The inducements are irresistible to the hungry Bohemian, so he puts a fresh canvas on the easel, and seats himself, palette in hand, to make the attempt. The other shuts his eyes for a moment in retrospection, and then savs:

"Well, there's a river runnin' right through the middle of the picture, that is what I want to see. Not a big river. Just a kind of overgrown creek. But that an't much of a de- eager, impatient turn about the room. scription, is it?" And he scratched his head and tries again.

But the other doesn't paint it. Instead he says: "There is nothing tangible in that:

"Well, across on the other side is a row of hills that stand right up hills there, will ye?"

The artist can do that. He was born among the hills, and now he recalls a certain group of them in every and murmurs between his sobs: detail. First, laying in a summer sky

"Well, by the eternal! It is like it, amazement. "But ye left out a house here on this side," he continues, "a little house with a thatched roof, and a tall oak tree bending over it."

The painter starts at this. It What a foolish fancy! A thousand homes would answer that description; and he goes on with his work. He paints the little house where he and his brother Tom were born-where they spent their childhood togetherthe little house from which Tom, his brave, big brother, his hero, grown desperate over the hard lot of their widowed mother, had gone away with a bold front to seek his fortune—their fortunes.

He paints the little house from which their mother, broken-hearted for want of tidings of her absent boy, had been borne to her grave-the house, no longer home, from which he had wandered, a weak, forlorn, helpless little lad, out into the big world alone-all alone, vainly wishing that he might find Tom.

Sav. stranger, could ye just put a woman in the door there, shadin' her eyes with her hand, like this?-a little, tired, anxious-lookin' woman, with the kindest face, the dearest face.

Could ye. stranger?" "No, the space is too small. I couldn't do it so that you could see the face."

"Paint me her face, will ye, stranger, will ye? See here." And he goes down into his capacious pockets and heaps a great pile of golden coin upon the table.

"Don't tell me you can't do it stranger. Ye thought ye couldn't do this but ye have. I'll try and tell ye how she looked. I can see her face yet, but it's kind of misty. If I could see one suthin' like it I could tell ye how it were different." And he takes an

The painter dare not speak. He dare not look into the questioner's face, lest he should lose the dear hope still growing in his heart. Instead, for answer, he rises, and, going to a corner of the room, lifts a faded curtain-draped as it might be over a shrine-and reveals upon a low easel the worn face of his saint, his mother. The gold seeker with a quick spasmodic catching of his breath, is on his knees before it, clutching the frame in both big, sunburnt hands, as if he feared this might be an illusory, fading vision.

His eves are fixed upon the face, and for a time be does not move or speak. Wnip-cords gather and knot themselves under the brown skin of his temples, and scalding tears well up in his eyes, and overflowing the rugged uplands of his cheeks in briny rivulets, lose themselves in the wilderness of his shaggy beard, that quakes and quavers like a stretch of standing corn in a storm. Then he presses his face against the cold canvas, kissing it over and over again, and giving great convulsive sobs.

Masonry is one and the same everywhere, but its standing and efficiency differ greatly. It is the same institution, having the same noble history, sublima principles and lofty purpose. It differs not in itself, but in its representatives.

During the mithrale 40 days' probation candidates were tested by tortures, since then Masonically symbolized. A new Masonic temple was dedicated at Warrensburg, Is., recently. It is an imposing structure 100 feet by 50 and three stories high and cost $80,000 The grand lodge of Scotland is doing an immense amount of injury to the craft all over the world by permitting the manufacture of Masons. The deadliest foes of Freemasonry are the popes of Rome. In 1788 Pope Clement XII fulminated his bull against the fraternity whose authority is still in exist-

The "house of wisdom" is a technical Arabian astrological term, the same as Bacon's "Solomon's House," from which London Freemasons borrowed some of their phraseology. "Pause and consider" is the admonition to every brother who thinks of casting an adverse ballot in a Masonic lodge. Grand Master Phelps of Iowa takes strong ground against the system of grand remresentatives.

The statutes of the grand encampment and of the grand commandery of New York state that officers re-elected need not be installed.

In Indiana the grand master decided that an English clergyman, a missionary, who had resided in the state for six months, could not petition for the degrees unless he had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. The grand lodge reversed the decision.

Why should you not advocate its principles? If there be any sins committed at times, they come through the misdeeds of the individual, and not through the order as a representative body.-Odd Fellows

During the last term three brothers in New Hampshire were killed by logs rolling over them in the woods or millyards. A noble grand who is always behind time will soon have a lodge just like him.
